Tourism as a Means Of Resolving the Armed Conflicts in the Middle East

Akmal Ramadan Amin
Lecturer at the Faculty of Tourism and Hotel Management
Alminya University, Egypt

Introduction:

Speaking about peace and Armed Conflicts in the Middle East calls us for eulogizing and standing to mourn the martyr Egyptian president "Sadat" who took the initiative in bringing about a practical peace to the Middle East between Egypt and Israel. It was a true peace coming from the bottom of the heart, mind, and conscience. Sadat brought about October victory and the first peace initiative between the Arabs and Israel. Sadat has precedence over anyone in stopping bloodshed and respecting human rights. In my genuine opinion, his Knesset address is equal to an international convention for protecting human rights. Mercy be upon Sadat without whom I will not be able to be among you here in this great scholarly conference. I may not be an exaggerator if I said that my essential motive of choosing this research is my personal and sentimental state of being impressed by the personality and charisma of the departed martyr Sadat (President Sadat’s Address To The Knesset, 1977).

The humble beginnings of peace and tourism can be traced back to early history when envoys were often sent to negotiate peace treaties, develop trade, or spread religious beliefs in other parts of the world. However, it was probably until 1986 when the International Institute of Peace through Tourism (IIPT) was established that the relationship between peace and tourism gained formal recognition globally. Founded in the United Nations International Year of Peace, the goal of IIPT was to leverage on the tourism industry to bring peace to a world plagued by terrorist activities, political strains, environmental degrading, and economic disparities. (Xiangru Tang, Clara 2005).

Thereafter, numerous peace and tourism movements, including the Global Peace Parks Project, Global Summit on Peace through Tourism, and IIPT regional and global conferences, have been organized at national, regional, and international levels, demonstrating the travel industry's commitment to building a culture of peace universally (IIPT Global Conferences 2004).
Today, the close relationship between peace and tourism is reinforced again due to the series of political, socio-cultural, economic and environmental instabilities in the last four years. As the travel industry gradually recovers from the 9-11 attack on America in 2001, Bali bombing in 2002, SARS outbreak in 2003, Asia Tsunami disaster in 2004, and the ongoing Iraq war, the world has also come to appreciate the importance of peace and tourism in our lives.

There is no doubt that the world now wants to achieve a permanent peace based on the understanding among peoples and the direct acquaintance among the citizens of different countries. In fact, these things became inevitable after possessing modern deadly nuclear weapons that threatened the existence of the humanity itself with all of its achievement. Thus tourism has a greater importance because it will not stand on its feet or prosper but under peace, security and stability it is also based on the direct communication among peoples, deepening information, interaction of civilizations and exchanging knowledge and accordingly it will lead to the spreading of an international understanding and forgiveness in a way that will serve the peace issue around the world (Mandela, Nelson 2000).

Over the years tourism was considered as a criterion for the development of the international relations regarding the economic, political, and social aspects where the effective contributions tend to achieve world peace. Add to that, the UN with its development program and the specialized UN agencies as the Labor organization, the UNESCO and all governmental, non-governmental, regional and international specialized unions working on tourism and now on top of it World Tourism Organization established in 1975, all these bodies and organizations tend to enhance cooperation among the countries and peoples in order to solve their political, economic, and social problems, all this will pave the way for achieving tourist cooperation among them and also organizing it on scientific and technical bases for reaching the desired world peace (Frangialli, Francesco 2003).

As a matter of fact tourism is one of the largest economic activities in the world, it accounts for the largest international and domestic movement of people. It may even be the largest single industry in the world. It is the world’s largest employer and the leading item of the trade in services. On the international level, this activity has political, economic and social ramifications (Wahab, Salah 1996, 1998, 2003).

But the purpose of this paper is not to discuss the traditional economic importance of tourism; it is rather to show the role of international tourism in resolving the problems of armed conflict in the Middle East.

The relation between tourism and security cannot be ignored. Undoubtedly, tourism is negatively affected by violence, terrorism and whatever kinds of armed conflicts. What is going on in the Middle East is a living evidence of this reality. On the other hand, my point is to show to what extent the tourist flow to the Middle East is a positive factor that could put an end to the deadly armed conflicts this universally important region has suffered for so long. Tourism could place considerable pressure on the international community to take the initiative to put an end to armed conflicts. Tourism can be regarded as one of the major factors that urge the governments over the world to fight all sorts of armed conflicts (Mowforth, Martin, Munt, Ian 2004).

It is also my concern to demonstrate the dynamic interaction between tourism and world peace, and the importance of tourism in achieving some considerable degree of closeness between different nations and people through enhancing the idea of the dialogue of civilizations instead of the clash of civilizations. Tourism does not only foster economic development but also supports human understanding. It gives people the opportunity to be acquainted with the cultural heritage of other nations. The tourist will be subjected to the natural as well as the cultural environment. His tourist tour includes landscapes, historic places, sites and established environments, in addition to biodiversity, collections, past and present cultural practices, knowledge and living experiences. Accordingly, he will recognize how cultural heritage forms the essence of various national, regional and indigenous identities. It is also an integral part of the character of nations, and how the heritage and collective memory of each locality or community represent an irreplaceable and important basis for development, now and in the future (Voicu, Ioan 2004).

Chapter I
The Opposite Relation between the international tourists flows and armed conflicts

It cannot be ignored that Tourism is an important source of national income to the countries of Middle East. The tourism industry generates substantial economic benefits to host countries all over the world. The main benefits of tourism to a country are foreign exchange earnings, tax revenues, business opportunities for budding entrepreneurs, and employment for workers in the industry. According to the WTO, "Tourism is one of the top five export categories for as many as 83% of countries and is the main source of foreign exchange earnings for at least 38% of countries,... 698 million people traveled to a foreign country in 2000, spending more US$ 478 billion. International tourism receipts combined with passenger transport currently total more than US$ 575 billion - making tourism the world's number one export earner, ahead of automotive products, chemicals, petroleum and food (WTO Tourism and Poverty Alleviation, Madrid 2002).

Foreign exchange earnings from exports are used to purchase imports and augment reserves. They generate income in the host country and can stimulate consumer spending and investment in other sectors of the economy. The tourism industry provides tremendous opportunity for relatively small businesses to thrive and also a leading generator of jobs. The hotel accommodation sector alone provided around 11.3 million jobs worldwide in 1995, according to the United Nations Environmental Program (UNEP). Tourism generates jobs directly through hotels, restaurants, nightclubs, taxis, and souvenir sales. Indirectly, jobs are generated through the supply of goods and services required by tourism.
related suppliers. The WTO estimates that tourism represents 7% of jobs worldwide (The Global Economics Game, 2000).

Any decline in tourism spending generates a magnified negative impact on total spending and employment. War, terrorism, crime, and natural disasters affect the tourism industry. While tourism has this international importance, it is an especially important industry to developing countries. Tourism is the only economic sector where developing countries consistently run a trade surplus. "It's especially significant in poorer countries that have few other options. For the world's 49 so-called least developed countries, tourism is the second largest source of foreign exchange after oil. Revenues from tourism have been especially important in the developing world, which stands to suffer severe economic losses from any slowdown in tourism. (The Global Economics Game, 2000).

But the problem with tourism is that it is not an independent industry that cannot be easily affected by other factors. Thus it is dangerous to depend solely on it as a main source of national income. It is directly affected positively and negatively by the armed military operations in the region; in other words, the tourist flow increases with the decrease of such operations and decreases with their increase and intensity. The tragic events of 11 September for instance have shattered the global tourism industry, which began to deteriorate following the terrorist attacks. While international tourism continued to grow in 2000, reaching unprecedented levels, international travel in 2001 declined by 0.6 per cent, the first year of negative growth since 1982 (Blake, Adam & Sinclair, M. Thea 2002).

Given that the Middle East is the scene for the most influential armed conflicts in the world, whether locally or internationally, we can recognize the great extent to which the economy of the Middle East countries could be affected by the decline of the tourist movement resulting from armed conflicts. In fact, the current decrease of the international tourist demand on the Middle East is a result of the violence caused by the regional armed conflicts there, and also by the worldwide security conditions. The Middle East has been one of the most affected regions following the 11/9 terrorist attacks on Washington and New York (Andersen, Arthur 2000).

According to WTO statistics, travel to the Middle East dropped by 8.8 per cent in 2001, compared with 2000. The same applies to the period of the invasion of Iraq. In short, the insecure conditions in the region have made future prospects for regional tourism vague and uncertain. "If Iraq is attacked, all of us have to forget about tourism for a while," said Nabil Samak, director of public relations at the Semiramis Intercontinental hotel just before the invasion. Instability in the Middle East has meant no tourism. Unless we have peace and stability in the region, we will not be able to regain our position as a tourist destination (Al-Ahram Weekly 2/10/2002).

Instability in the region would be devastating to its economy and tourism industry. The negative impacts of this contraction of the tourist demand on the Middle East on other facilities such as education, health services and the infrastructure are very serious. Armed conflicts are attributed to political decay, facilitate state collapse, cause widespread human rights violations, generate refugees and internally displaced persons, and exacerbate famine conditions. Conflicts also divert scarce resources away from social services, disrupt trade, discourage tourism, and contribute to the breakdown of family structures. The pervasiveness and persistence of conflict have also grave psychological consequences as children are traumatized or become accustomed to a culture of violence (Khalaf-Hunaidi, Rima 1999).

On the other hand tourism could bring about the seeds of peace, as the start of tourism developments marks the initial contact between the host and guest. During this stage, few but significant changes take place at the three levels of interactions. (Wahab, Salah 1999).

Firstly, tourism begins at a governmental level because government regulations and policies are required to facilitate travel. For example: Family travel between Lahore and Delhi and between the two sides of the Kashmir area is now possible with the introduction of bus services on these routes. Not only has tourism improved family relations, but also paved way for thawing relations between the two countries. Indeed, tourism often creates a platform for governments to work together towards bilateral agreements such as air rights and visa rules. Tourism may even act as a preliminary communication channel between politically divided countries (Chinchinian, Harry 2002).

This may apply to the Middle East but unfortunately, the Middle East continues to have the greatest number of armed conflicts around the world. Latent or open hostilities resulting from national and political conflicts or religious discrepancy affect most countries in the region. We have the Israel-Palestinian conflict, the US-led war on Iraq, the confrontations between Lebanon’s Hizbullah and the Israeli forces, Syria and its conflict with Israel and the US, the problems in Afghanistan and the existence of Osama Bin Laden’s organization al-Qaida, which causes panic to the world community and thus hinder the tourist and travel movement to the area.

There is militant or political Islam and the Islamist fundamental organizations’ conflict with the dominant secular regimes in so many Middle East Muslim countries like Algeria, and Egypt. Islamists weave together the struggle in Palestine, the crisis in Iraq, the question of Kashmir, and of course the struggle of the Mujahadeen in Afghanistan into a kind of ‘Islamic internationalism’ based on the idea of armed confrontation with the forces of imperialism (Andersen, Arthur 2000).

Turkey has also suffered from this at the hands of terrorists over the past 15 years. In fact, Turkey has lost more than 40,000 of its citizens to the Kurdistan Workers Party (PKK) and other terrorist groups. There is also the undercurrent rejection of the US interference with the internal conditions of the area, which lead sometimes to a series of devastating bomb attacks, like the huge truck bomb at the Khobar Towers base near Dhahran, targeting US military and civilian personnel. Important figures from the religious opposition gave a fatwa, or religious judgment, excommunicating the Saudi royal family from Islam for supporting the US onslaught on Afghanistan. The demand for US withdrawal from Saudi Arabia is a key element of Osama Bin Laden's campaign against the Saudi royal family (The Middle East Forum May 2002).

Terrorism can be regarded as a kind of armed conflict where the terrorists express their conflict with the predominant culture and thought using arms. There is no factor that can lead more to the decline of tourism than terrorism. There have been instances in specific countries where an adverse event affecting tourism has brought about a negative multiplier effect on the nation’s economy. There are certain countries like Egypt that are more vulnerable to the adverse economic effects of terrorism on tourism, because tourism is such a significant part of their overall economic activity. Others are less vulnerable to the ill effects of terrorism on tourism, because their economies are more diverse. UAE is a good example (Andersen, Arthur 2000).

Egypt was badly affected by the tragic terrorist events in the 1990s of the last century when many people were assassinated just for being tourists, which was a terrible blow to tourism. On November 17, 1997, a terrorist attack targeting visitors to the Temple of Hatshepsut in Luxor, threw Egypt's tourism industry into turmoil. The negative impact of the Luxor tragedy is clearly reflected by the data. The effect of the Luxor tragedy is clearly reflected in the level of visitor arrivals to Egypt in 1998, which declined by 13.8 percent over 1997. International tourism receipts also reflect the impact of the tragedy, with a decrease of 45.4 percent over 1997. Visitor arrivals to Egypt declined by 13.8 percent from 1997 to 1998. Egypt's international tourism receipts decreased by 45.4 percent in 1998 compared to 1997. Egypt is one of those countries which tourism is a substantial share of overall economic activity (Andersen, Arthur 2000).

That's why the ordinary Egyptians unanimously opposed to a war on Iraq, but not based on rank anti-Americanism. For them it comes down to the economy. In countries where oil and other industries are largely state-owned, tourism is a time-honored source of revenue for the average Middle Easterner.

Tourism is Egypt's second largest foreign exchange earner, and Egypt accounts for 50 percent of all tourist arrivals coming to Africa and the Middle East. By mid-1997, Egypt seemed well on its way to attracting an expected four million tourists, the highest level for this popular North African destination. But it has lost such advantage after the terrorist attacks. The attack aimed at destabilizing Egypt's tourism industry by striking at a major tourist attraction at the start of the winter peak season, also came at the start of World Travel Market in London, one of the travel and tourism industry’s largest trade fairs, at which Egypt was a major participant. Three years later tourism in Egypt is bouncing back. In 1999, tourism growth in Africa and the Middle East outpaced the world average, increasing by 17.5 percent over 1998. (The Global Economics Game, 2000).

Well reported damage control implemented by the Egyptian authorities immediately following the Luxor attack, included increased security at all tourist sites and hotels, has gone a long way to allay safety fears and restore consumer confidence in the destination. This is clearly reflected in the increase in tourist arrivals and tourism receipts in 1999, which surpassed 1997 levels (The Global Economics Game 2000).

Recognizing the importance of tourism and how it's greatly badly affected by tourism, soon after the mournful drama of September 11, the WTO issued a "Report of the Secretary-General: Terrorist Attacks in the United States of America." The proclamation acknowledged that the "unprecedented and brutal act of terrorism is likely to have profoundly negative consequences for domestic and international tourism." It strongly condemned "heinous acts of terrorism," characterized terrorism as "an enemy of peace and tourism," expressed compassion to the people of the United States and victims of the tragic event, and proffered a firm conviction that "tourism is a resilient sector which has repeatedly demonstrated its ability to overcome problems and weather crises." (WTO, 2001).

Chapter II

Utilizing International Tourism in stopping the Armed Conflicts in the Middle East

While tourism is negatively affected by armed conflicts, international tourism can be used as an anti-factor against the eruption of armed conflicts. There are different aspects through which tourism can contribute to the solving of this problem. The economic decline resulting from the slowdown in the tourist movement urges the governments to fight the reasons for this slowdown and slump in the worldwide tourism industry, and save security and peace in the area. In this respect, security has become a significant factor of any propaganda for tourist programs (Var, Turgut and Ap John 1998).

We can say that the recent terrorist attack, and the possibility of new attacks, has given the travel and tourism a major wake-up call concerning security. In the old travel industry paradigm, industry leaders rarely spoke about threats to tourists in public fearing that such openness would scare away visitors. The common belief was that security was a "necessary evil" that one had to have, but that security added nothing to the business' bottom line. For this reason, tourism and travel security were rarely publicized, never mentioned in marketing campaigns, under-funded, and its practitioners were often underpaid. The old paradigm led to poor security at airports, hotels, restaurants and attractions. Security professionals who spoke of acts of terrorism, bio-chemical attacks, and crime were seen as alarmist and asked to rephrase their warnings in ways that would be acceptable for public consumption (Ramadan, Akmal 2001).

Because of the increase of armed conflicts and terrorism in the host countries, the public was beginning to change its views. Even prior to the September attacks, there were multiple signs that the public began to be concerned about and demanded good tourism security. Throughout the travel and tourism industry evidence began to appear that the customers were choosing locations and venues precisely because they were safe and secure. Studies and scholarly articles noted that security personnel were beginning to obtain some of the tourism security training that was needed.

The new paradigm for the travel and tourism industry is based on the fact that tourism security is now a major part of a location’s marketing strategy, the tourism and travel industry is beginning to assimilate this paradigm change. Tourist companies and airlines have incorporated into their marketing plans the idea that visitor security is their number one priority. State and national tourism conferences are adding speeches about tourism security and its impact on marketing (Ramadan, Akmal 2001).

Tourist Company now should adapt to this paradigm shift. They should recognize that there is a fundamental paradigm, shift in the travel industry. Old assumptions will no longer hold. From a business perspective these old assumptions are very dangerous. Those parts of the travel and tourism industry that emphasize security will have a good chance of surviving. The venues that provide giving good security mixed with good customer service will flourish. Those parts of the travel and tourism industry that hold on to the old way of thinking will fade away (Santana, Gui 2001).

But we should not create a false sense of security. We should deal with the reasons, not the symptoms and ramifications of terrorism and armed conflicts, through gas masks and sealed rooms and the like, or assuring people the police forces will be very alert to any attack. We should instead fight the reasons, which lead to these attacks. The industry workers should know what is unsafe in their community and work with local governments to improve these security concerns. They ought to work hard to restore confidence in the minds of potential travelers regarding airline safety and convenience. If the global coalition of countries combating terrorism is successful at rounding up terrorists, destroying their networks, and confiscating their finances, perhaps confidence will be restored and international travel will return to some semblance of normalcy (Santana, Gui 2001).

In attempting to resolve the problems, which lead to conflict and terrorism in the Middle East, we should look to the internal conditions of the Middle East countries. The approaches like “hostile countries”, “foreign troops”, which are mentioned frequently in Middle East countries can be misleading, even if they have some bases in reality. If there is a terror existing widespread somewhere, it is necessary to admit and determine that there is something going wrong. Terrorists come from our people, target our people, and act inside our borders. Accordingly, the solution should be sought on the same soil, but this does not mean that one should ignore the impact of foreign troops (Ramadan, Akmal 2006).

Among the reasons, which lead to terrorism and armed conflicts in the Middle East, are the people’s poor economic conditions. Economic pressures have corroded the Arab rulers’ domestic support to the point where it is hard to see any of the current regimes regaining the level of popular legitimacy they enjoyed a generation ago. In Egypt, for instance, living standards have been falling for more than a generation. The economic pressure on ordinary Egyptians has not slackened for the last 20 years. The social value of salaries has fallen on a regular basis. In addition the public health and education systems are approaching collapse after years of degradation. Thus the only way to pass crucial high school and university exams is by paying for the expensive private tutorials, which teachers offer to increase their meager salaries. The conditions are not much better in most Arab countries. This will make the people lose confidence in the ruling regimes, which sometimes resort to a brutal security apparatus to stifle dissent (Ramadan, Akmal 2006).

What makes people much more displeased and leads to armed conflicts and terrorism are the political, economic, and cultural imperialism the US imposes on the Middle East countries. Most Middle East countries now regard America as a “big brother” to whom they turn for guidance and support and for whom they can express nothing but absolute obedience and respect.

In fact, imperialism intensifies the impact of economic crisis around the Middle East by creating conditions in which anger over economic issues can quickly spill over into a more generalized challenge to the regime as a whole. Internal economic crisis and external intervention are the subjective conditions, which are ultimately crucial in turning riots into organized demonstrations, and street clashes with the police into a mass movement. The issue of Palestine and the Intifada are a key marker for this process of radicalism. Demonstrations done by students in Egypt at the outbreak of the uprising were quickly joined by workers. Slogans on the protests moved on from demands for dismissing the Israeli ambassador to the issues of high prices, corruption of government and state oppression. Across the Middle East in general, the connection between local economic crisis and the imperialist intervention could bring about further serious confrontations between the local and global ruling classes and the peoples of the region (Santana, Gui 2001).

As I have already mentioned protecting the tourism industry could be a very significant motive prompting the Middle East leaders to correct the mistakes of their regimes and consequently avoid the reasons of terrorism and internal and external armed conflicts. Now there is no doubt that the weakening of social order is an important factor that would bring about a potential disorder, which is the result of terror. The healthier a body is the more resistant and immune against viruses. Measures have to be taken to make the region more democratic in order to put an end to terrorism (Mowforth, Martin, Munt, Ian 2004).

The Middle East governments should respect the rule of law, human rights, and freedom of expression. Of course the most important weapon against terrorism is education. We should regain the hearts and minds of our children back from extremists through education. The power of democracy and our way of life depend on the future generations of educated boys and girls who respect knowledge, moderation, education, and gender equality. Consequently, the terrorist activities resulting from the socio-economic conditions of the society and the failing of the existing system will have no soil to grow in. Terrorism will live as long as the imbalance and imperfection of the societies that leads to the emergence of many displeased people (Zahran, Ahmed S & Ramadan, Akmal 2006).

In any attempt to stop armed conflicts in the Middle East, we can not ignore the urgent need to make the Middle East free from the WMDs in order to attract the international investments in general and tourist investments in particular. We need also to fight the easy transfer of the light weapons. The Middle East is an attractive market for opportunistic arms merchants. In fact, arms transfers and trafficking remain one of the Middle East major security problems. The influx of light weapons has prolonged the conflicts in the Middle East and made them more dangerous. The international community's inability to control arms transfers and trafficking contributes in the persistence of these devastating conflicts (Santana, Gui 2001).

There should be international and regional efforts to control arms transfers and trafficking. Arms transfers and trafficking have continued to spiral in part, because the international community has not effectively enforced UN sanctions or criminalized siege violations or penalized financial institutions that act as agents for weapons purchases and also failed to promote local controls over arms production and sales to countries under UN arms embargoes, or taking actions against countries that serve as arms transshipment points (Nazarkin, Yuri K 1998).

There should be international and regional programs to reduce the flow of weapons coming to the Middle East. There should be genuine initiatives to stop the devastating impact that arms transfers have on the Middle East. The United Nations in particular has to exert its greatest effort to enforce its arms embargo against any country that violates its resolutions.

Beyond arms embargoes, the UN and some member states, notably Canada and Great Britain, have advocated a "name and shame" policy. According to UN Secretary General Kofi Annan, the "public identification of international arms merchants" is the single most important tool in combating the arms trafficking problem. On September 24, 1999, the UN Security Council held its first ministerial meeting on small arms; this led to a Security Council presidential statement urging member states to curb arms trafficking. The UN's "name and shame" strategy has had no impact on weapons flows. To ameliorate the arms trafficking problem in the Middle East, the international community should be willing to levy painful individuals or countries to dissuade them from selling arms to or within the Middle East (Resolution 59/74 adopted by the General Assembly 2004).

The ultimate vision of tourism is to attain peace through fostering amiable host-guest relationships founded on shared cultural understanding and acceptance and equitable returns. At this stage, the world enjoys political, economic, environmental, and socio-cultural.
stability. Because we are living in a global village, "domestic" issues are no longer restricted within the geographical boundaries of a place. Every nation works together towards maintaining world peace (Wahab, Salah 1998).

Last year, when the Indian Ocean earthquake and tsunami hit Asia, travel almost came to a standstill in the affected destinations. The impacts of sluggish tourism performance, which quickly trickled down the economy, highlighted the value of travel industry and prompted world organizations and governments to cooperate in restoring peace and regaining travel confidence among people (Xiangru Tang, Clara 2005).

Tourism in itself can be an important factor that contributes in getting rid of some of the major causes of terrorism and armed conflicts. No one can deny the role of the tourist investments in solving unemployment problems and other social ones, which result in violence and terrorism. There is also a role which international tourism can play in achieving constructive communication and closeness between different peoples from different cultural background (Wahab, Salah 1998).

Most international and local conflicts result from not respecting the other's ideology. The terrorists' attack on tourism in the Middle East is mostly grounded in the idea that tourism forms a threat to the cultural and religious heritage of their conservative countries and may lead to adverse impacts on their lifestyles. According to them, visitors who show little respect for the sanctity of spiritual places, practices and traditions by conducting themselves in a rash manner can have an adverse impact on those places and the communities that regard them as important parts of their cultural identity (Voicu, Ioan 2004).

But this view reflects a narrow understanding and a lack of insight into the underlying theory of tourism. "Tourism must not have such negative impacts," Mastny says. "Many governments and businesses, local communities, and tourists themselves are already paying more attention to the social, cultural, and environmental impacts of their activities." (Mastny, Lisa, 2001).

It can be planned to facilitate and encourage the tourism industry to promote and manage tourism in ways that respect and enhance the heritage and living cultures of the host communities, and to facilitate and encourage a dialogue between conservation interests and the tourism industry about the importance and fragile nature of heritage places, collections and living cultures including the need to achieve a sustainable future for them (Voicu, Ioan 2004).

In fact, there is an active relation between tourism and mutual understanding between the nations. Domestic and international tourism continues to be among the leading vehicles of cultural exchange. It provides a personal experience, not only that which has survived from the past, but also the contemporary life and society of others. It is increasingly appreciated as a positive force for natural and cultural conservation. Tourism can attract the economic distinctiveness of heritage and harness these for conservation by generating funding, educating the community and influencing the ongoing policy. It is an essential part of many national and regional economies and can be an important factor of development, when managed successfully (Wahab, Salah 1998).

Tourism itself has become an increasingly complex phenomenon, with political, economic, social, cultural, educational, biophysical, ecological and aesthetic dimensions. Natural and cultural heritage, diversities and living cultures are major tourism attractions. The achievement of a beneficial interaction between the potentially conflicting expectations and aspirations of visitors and the host or local communities presents many challenges and opportunities. (Mastny, Lisa, 2001).

The tourist does not want the same culture of his homeland but he seeks cultural difference. He leaves the familiar place of home and travels to a foreign and strange place in order to experience the difference between here and there. This cultural difference is material, historical, religious, political, economic, and social one. The reason for this search for something different is that the imagination of the capitalist «first world» is exhausted. It cannot imagine anything different, so the tourist leaves the homogenous space of «home» for the heterogeneous space of «foreign climes» simply to admire the picturesque, the mere view or snapshot of difference, to see the difference. This cultural difference is rooted in language, landscape, architecture, custom, taste, and smell. It is very physical. The more it is used up or taken away, the less remains, and thus the less it will be attractive to tourists (Bey, Hakim 2000).

Those conservative people who are against tourism coming to the Middle East, particularly to the Muslim nations and believe that it will put it in danger of extinction of their native culture and cultural heritage, should be convinced that tourism could bring many benefits to the host communities and provide an important means and motivation for them to care for and maintain their heritage and cultural practices (Tantawy, Mohamed S 2005).

They should be aware of the fact that the tourist seeks out culture and difference. The involvement and cooperation of local or indigenous community representatives, conservatives, tourist operators, property owners, policy makers, those preparing national development plans and site managers are necessary to achieve a sustainable tourism industry and to enhance the protection of heritage resources for future generations.

Conclusion:

Due to the intricacies of personal and political interactions, tourism is only one of the vehicles for building peace because issues such as religious and political beliefs are also central in shaping relationships. I argue that the world’s largest industry (Tourism) is looked upon as a central force for advocating peace. The tourism industry is certainly a significant step in bridging people together and creating universal peace.

I have attempted by way of this research to shed much light in the role which tourism may play in solving the armed and political conflicts in the Middle East, and consequently it will have a position impact on the countries of that region including Egypt, considering tourism as a tool of the peace and acquaintance among peoples. And this is what has been include the Manila declaration of world tourism in 1980 issued from Manila tourist conference the presence of the representatives of these states, which established a basic principle that the world tourism must have the ability to be an affective power to achieve world peace. This declaration has been made sure of by Colombia declaration issued from the conference which titled “tourism is a push toward peace” held in Frankfort in the united states in October 1998 which issued the creed o the peaceful traveler (Wahab, Salah 1998.)

In the above-mentioned research, we have presented the role of tourism as a means for civilization dialogue instead of the clashes of civilization is considered as the first affected sector by wars, violence and terrorism in the world generally and in the Middle East particularly. Egypt may be one of the countries that have been affected by some negative impacts of the tourism sector as a result of the contentious situation of the Middle East.
The thing that calls tourism to defend itself and its legitimate existence, and surely the best way is by playing a role in solving the military and political disputes in the Middle East (Andersen, Arther 2000).

Then tourism through its ability in the economic and social development, could plant better concepts for dialogue between different governments in many aspects as concluding agreements of air transport, granting aviation liberties, granting visas, avoiding double taxation and customs. In addition to the relationships between businessmen who have deferent nationalities in tourism development and hotel construction domains, do undoubtedly contribute in establishing the bonds and ties of dialogue and contact. Add to that, the economic importance of tourism pushes the governments to think seriously in solving the political disputes peacefully and to leave no stone unturned before resorting to the political and military escalation, which is considered as a repellent factor of tourism that has many negative impacts (Robinson, M & Bonifak &p 1998)

In the end, I would like to give some brief space to my suggestions concerning how to benefit much from world tourism as a significant means of solving armed conflicts. On top of these suggestions is providing easy and safe travel ways for the tourists from their countries to the neighboring countries to get acquainted with new civilizations, cultures, life styles and ways of thinking; improving the curricula in the Middle East countries in a way that includes encouraging peace and international dialogue, and purifying these curricula from whatever thoughts and ideologies that stimulate violence and fundamentalism. There is also a great need for activating the role of the international, social and religious organizations in urging a constant and influential dialogue between different civilizations, adopting the idea of accepting the other, whosoever this other can be, and encouraging peaceful co-existence instead of the aggressive idea of armed confrontations. All this can be done through the local governments of the Middle East under the auspices of the international organizations, particularly the United Nations.
In the end, I would like to give some brief space to my suggestions concerning how to benefit much from world tourism as a significant means of solving armed conflicts. On top of these suggestions is providing easy and safe travel ways for the tourists from their countries to the neighboring countries to get acquainted with new civilizations, cultures, life styles and ways of thinking; improving the curricula in the Middle East countries in a way that includes encouraging peace and international dialogue, and purifying these curricula from whatever thoughts and ideologies that stimulate violence and fundamentalism.

There is also a great need for activating the role of the international, social and religious organizations in urging a constant and influential dialogue between different civilizations, adopting the idea of accepting the other, whosoever this other can be, and encouraging peaceful co-existence instead of the aggressive idea of armed confrontations.

All this can be done through the local governments of the Middle East under the auspices of the international organizations, particularly the United Nations.
References:

Al-Ahram Weekly 2/10/2002 At: weekly.ahram.org.eg/2002/605/ec3.htm

Frangiali, Francesco (2003): At the meeting of the United Nations Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC), (Geneva, 10 July 2003)

Harry Chinchinian (2002) India Pakistan in War and Peace - Routledge (UK) P. 268 – 268

IIPT Global Conferences (2004): The institute of international Peace through Tourism Available at: http://www.iipt.org

Ioan, Voicu (2004): Tourism, as a means of bringing people closer together, is a force for harmony and peace between nations, cultures, religions and individuals, at: http://www.world-tourism.org/tsunami/news/64.pdf

President Sadat’s Address to the Knesset, November 20, 1977.
http://www.alsadat2.4t.com/SPEECHES/president_sadat.htm

Ramadan, Akmal

(2006): The Egyptian tourism between the international politics and the universal culture, Think Tank VI, Spain, 2006.

Resolution 59/74 adopted by the General Assembly (2004): Assistance to States for curbing the illicit traffic in small arms and collecting them available online at: http://www.ianxa.org/un/bms2005/N044070.pdf

The Middle East Forum: May 31, 2002 At: http://www.meforum.org/article/299

Wahab, Salah:

(2003): The Egyptian tourism in the age of globalization, south call magazine, issued from the center of the development nation researches and studies p.47.

السياحة كوسيلة لحل النزاعات المسلحة في منطقة الشرق الأوسط

حاولت من خلال هذا البحث إلقاء الضوء على الدور الذي يمكن السياحة أن تلعبه في حل النزاعات المسلحة والسياسية في منطقة الشرق الأوسط، بما يتبع ذلك من تأثير إيجابي على دولة المنطقة ومنها مصر بطبيعة الحال، وكان ذلك إنجازاً من النظرة للسياحة بإعتبارها أداة للسلام والتفاوض بين الشعوب، وهو ما تضمنه إعلان مانولا للسياحة العالمية عام 1980 والصادر عن مؤتمر مانولا السياحي بحضور ممثلي 120 دولة، والذي أقر مبدأ أساسياً مفاده أن تكون للسياحة العالمية القدرة على أن تكون قوة فعالة لتحقيق السلام العالمي. عدد من هؤلاء في البحث على محاولة عرض الأدبيات والكتب العربية والأجنبية والتي من خلالها يمكننا تناول هذا الموضوع والذي سوف أعود على تقسيمه إلى مبحثين:

المبحث الأول: عن العلاقة بين النزاعات المسلحة والسياحة الدولية. تقدم السياحة هذها نظرة للنزاعات المسلحة والإرهاب للأطراف المتزاحمة تستهدف الأنشطة السياحية والسياحية بمواجهة أخطار أية أهداف إرهابية وإدامة شرعية سياسية، وأظهار الحكومات في موقف ضعيف مما يضعف النكهة فيما تقدمها دوليا ودوليا، وبسببه بشك من بعض الأماند. ووالواقع أن تفسير العلاقة بين السياحة والنزاعات المسلحة أمر ليس بالسيء، حيث تؤدي تلك المنازات إلى تسلل الضوء إلى الأحداث، ولا شك أن أحداث الانتظار سوف يكون فعالاً وقائياً في حالة الإعتراف على أشخاص من جنسيات مختلفة، مما يحدث ذلك من تدفق في العلاقات الدولية، كما يودي إلى زعزعة ثقة الحكومات الخارجية في فترة الدولة على حفظ الأمن والظام.

أما المبحث الثاني: فعرضنا فيه لدور السياحة في حل المنازات السياسية والعسكرية في منطقة الشرق الأوسط: فعرضنا دور السياحة في ظل الدولة كوسيلة لحوار الحضارات بدلاً من صراع الحضارات، فالسياحة في ظل الدولة الشاملة التزمناً الأول بالحروب وأحداث العنف والإرهاب في العالم بصورة عامية ومنطقة الشرق الأوسط بصورة خاصة، ولعل مصر كانت من الدول التي حصلت أثراً سلبياً في مجال السياحة من جراء الوضع المتزاحم في منطقة الشرق الأوسط، وهو ما يدعو إلى قيام السياحة لدفع عينها وبروية ووجودها، وخبر وسيلة لهذا الدفع هو أن تلعب دوراً في حل المنازات السياسية والعسكرية في منطقة الشرق الأوسط.

فالسياحة من خلال قدرتها على التنمية الاقتصادية والاجتماعية يمكننا أن تزرع مفاهيم أفضل للحوار على المستوى الحكومي والشعبي، كما يمكننا أن تقوى العلاقات بين الحكومات المختلفة والمتمثلة في نواحي كثيرة مثل عدد إتفاقات النقل الحواف، ومن حريات الطيران، ومنح المؤسسات وتفعيل الأزواج الضريبي الجمركي، كما أن العلاقات بين رجال الأعمال مختلفين الجنسية في مجالات التنمية السياحية والإنشاءات النافذة لتسع في توسيع أواصر الحوار والتصدح، أضاف إلى ذلك أن الاختلافات الإدارية للسياحة تدفع الحكومات أن تفتك بدلًا في حل النزاعات السياسية بالطرق السلمية وأن تفتك بدلًا من التدخل الإقليمي والدولي الذي يعد طاردا للسياحة وما ينبعه ذلك من أثار سلبية.

ثم عرضنا لأهم النتائج والتوصيات المفترضة.